

Northwell Health at Staten Island University Hospital

The Residency in Psychiatry at Staten Island University Hospital is focused on helping you to develop the skills necessary to be a lifelong learner, whatever type of practice you pursue. Whether you choose an academic career, hospital-based practice, office practice or some amalgam of the three, we want you to be ever curious and confident that you can maintain your skills in the future.

In the decades to come, psychiatry is likely to face both significant challenges and transformative opportunities. It will be increasingly important for psychiatrists to be comfortable with the medical aspects of psychiatric care, the interface of psychiatric and medical illnesses, and the impact of psychiatric morbidity on the outcome of both acute and chronic medical illnesses such as heart disease, diabetes mellitus and oncologic disorders, among others.

Our training program will equip you to cope with these demands confidently. In addition, our emphasis on holistic understanding of psychiatric conditions and symptoms, and our focus on understanding and addressing the health needs of our community on Staten Island, will prepare you to be health care leaders and forces for constructive change in your communities.
